Chemotherapy-related fatigue with dynamic changes in cytokine profiles in plasma. We evaluated cytokine levels in plasma during chemotherapy with or without granulocyte colony-stimulating factor (G-CSF) in patients undergoing adjuvant chemotherapy after curative resection for gastric cancer. Preoperative plasma cytokine levels were assessed in 36 patients before the start of chemotherapy. All patients received chemotherapy, and patients who were seropositive for human T-cell lymphoma virus type-I (HTLV-I) were given G-CSF at a dose of 5 mg for 2 days. After 8-11 weeks of chemotherapy, the levels of interleukin (IL)-1beta, IL-6, IL-8 and tumor necrosis factor-alpha (TNF-alpha) in plasma were measured again. The levels of IL-1beta, IL-8 and TNF-alpha were significantly higher in the patients who did not receive G-CSF. The majority of patients who received G-CSF showed lower levels of IL-1beta, IL-8 and TNF-alpha in plasma. These results suggest that chemotherapy-induced fatigue related to cytokines is reduced in patients who receive G-CSF.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method for fabricating a semiconductor device. 2. Description of the Related Art With an increasing miniaturization of a semiconductor integrated circuit device, it is necessary to reduce an exposure amount of a wafer, for example. The exposure amount of a wafer, however, generally has a maximum resolution limit due to problems such as a finite depth of focus. In order to reduce the exposure amount, multi-step exposure technology has been proposed. The multi-step exposure technology is such that the exposure amount is changed stepwise during exposure of an entire area of a wafer. Thus, a smaller exposure amount can be set than a resolution limit even when the exposure amount is changed stepwise. A method for reducing the exposure amount in the multi-step exposure technology will be briefly described below. First, a mask is divided into multiple units of exposure areas, and the exposure area is divided into multiple partial areas. The multiple units of exposure areas are repeated in multiple layers, with the exposure area being repeated in the multiple layers. At this time, a number of exposure areas divided into a single exposure area is normally 10 times or 20 times as large as the number of exposure areas of the entire
